In the past year, ISIS has grown exponentially, committing atrocities in an international landscape that it never has before. It has taken over large swaths of Iraq and Syria, and it also now controls territory in Libya, Egypt and northern Afghanistan. Al Qaeda's leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has called on ISIS to become the official branch of the "caliphate." This is not, of course, going to happen. Al Qaeda has no identifiable leadership structure and is an international amorphous entity. ISIL, for its part, is highly centralized and bureaucratic. There is a "Conference of The Islamic State" that meets every three months. The group also uses something called "Emirates," a kind of tax system, to hold the money it takes in during the local fiscal year. It's all very reminiscent of the Taliban. From the start, ISIS has displayed a ruthlessness that Al Qaeda has never before matched. It has executed and enslaved thousands of people, indoctrinated children, and used the latest technology to spread its propaganda and story of brutality. It also has successfully used social media to spread its message online. Indeed, it's smart for a terrorist group to use online tools in a way that might draw non-jihadists to join it. Al Qaeda, by contrast, has mostly kept a low profile and has relied on old-fashioned messengers, such as Osama bin Laden, to communicate with Muslims. ISIS is also just as likely to use its hostages as soldiers for battle as it is to keep them hostage. Recent ISIS footage of the group's commitment to using its resources has included not just fighting other militant groups but also advancing its cause in Morocco and the United Arab Emirates. Of course, ISIS is not foolproof when it comes
